It was always intended that Amelia would marry Whit Carrow and she feels that pressure â€“ she feels trapped. As the burden of expectation weighs her down she wonders...Does she still need to marry? Does Whit even like her? Why is she being so rude to him? Amelia finds her emotions tossed about and battered as Whit rejects her, much as her father did. â€œWhy would I want to marry a woman who scowls at me every time she looks in my direction and spits venom at me every time I pass within range?â€• With cattle rustlers targeting Russets Reach, Whit must spend long nights in the saddle. Why is he thinking about Amelia? It seems her rudeness has made her more interesting! When Amelia happens upon the rustlers who will be saved? Can love be found within tragedy? Customer Reviews

Amelia is the last sister of the three sisters that were sold off to be mail order brides from England. Unlike her sisters, she does not want to get married. She is rude and hides from her fiancé, Whit. Whit has to deal with cattle rustlers, meetings, and night patrols so he has no time to worry about her. They often fight and are drifting further apart. Then, Amelia gets a letter from her old governess with news from back home and she wonders if she might be happier back home. Her homesickness is amplified when a friend from town hints that she saw Whit with another woman. The characters work to bring the story out.

I really love this series. I want more. I would rather not talk about it and ruin someone else's reading enjoyment. That said, really good read. If you want a good clean series to read, check this one out. You won't be sorry. I will say that it said to be continued. When will it be out and I hope it or maybe another one will be about Nancy. She deserves her own story and others.

Good Christian Fiction

I liked the way the author described the scenery. I liked the interaction of the main characters, and how they changed over time
